AND THERE IS A WILD LEGEND OF THE DUKE.

There is a wild legend of the Duke, reading a certain article in a paper first published ten years ago, which it is painful to

Q. "But do you mean to say this is meant for me?"

A. "I'm afraid so, sir."

Of course the Duke may never have been so unkindly; nor can the Duke have found it so difficult to restrain his feelings as to stamp the paper, uttering his exclamations of the while.

Here are a couple of facts which reveal the Duke in his double capacity of real soldier and routine man. One Easter Monday there was a grand volunteer review on Brighton Downs; but it rained so hard that the military authorities were for dismissing the Volunteers to their homes, or to the nearest houses of entertainment in the neighbourhood. This, however, was before the Duke had arrived; his Royal Highness, not without some hearty exclamations of contempt for those who feared to give the Queen's lieges a drizzling, ordered the review to proceed at once. To do the citizen soldierly justice, I believe they were generally the Duke, for not creating them a mere holiday-makers. In fact, the military bigwigs had to pay them a sorry compliment.

The other fact illustrates the Duke's love of neatness, also his want of an eye for the picturesque. Some regiments had returned from the Crimea, and were to march past the Queen. In war-time the men had naturally been allowed to grow their beards; and her Majesty, in a motherly way, was anxious to see her soldiers even as they had looked while fighting her battles. But the Duke was determined they should all be "smart" before appearing in the Sovereign's presence, and had every private and non-commissioned officer duly shaved for the occasion.

Needless to say, the Duke is a hard worker. He is even a Prince of the Peace could hold high office nowadays without that indispensable qualification. He has also, in spite of a quick temper, something of that deference towards public opinion which may be described as a sort of heroic patience, peculiar to public men. Punch accused him of injustice to Lord Palmerston of Magdala. There was then the shadow of foundation for the charge, but the Duke thought it necessary to clear himself in the most formal manner at a public dinner, mentioning Punch by name. I doubt whether Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia would condescend to notice an attack in the Kladderadsköld or the Fliegende Blätter.

It is sometimes forgotten that the Duke is not only a soldier, but a statesman. He is a member of the House of Commons, and has been anything to happen to the Duke of Cumberland, he would inherit that peerage's claim to the Crown of Hanover, as well as the remainder to the Sovereignty of Brunswick.

It is understood that, not very long since, negotiations were set on foot to induce the Duke of Cumberland to abdicate his peerage, and to accept of a pension in lieu of it. Prince Albert had the good sense to refuse the offer; so, on Wellington's death, they made Lord Raglan commander. He was a kind of a warning-man for the Duke of Cambridge, who began to dictate from the Horse Guards in 1855.

The Duke had smelt powder by this time, and on the whole, his record was eminently satisfactory. But he had not yet taken to heart those strict principles of discipline which are the glory of the British Army.

Some thirty years ago, the Great Duke thought it good to forbid smoking at mess dinners. Now, Prince George of Cambridge, to give him his due, had been invited to dine with the officers of a regiment quartered in Dublin. After dinner, the officers, came the coffee, when Prince George took out a cigar-case, observing: "I don't know what you are going to do, gentlemen. I'm going to smoke." And the Prince handed his cigar-case to the Colonel, who followed the example of his Royal Highness, as did all the other officers.

This was not quite an ideal example of conduct. But then Wellington's order had been almost universally disobeyed from the first, and it was not even thought worth while to send Prince George. The Russian War came, and he was appointed to the command of a Division, being already a Major-General. By that time he had been promoted to his father's dukedom, and had been voted £12,000 a year by Parliament, to the anguish of Mr. Haume and others. The Duke went creditably through Alma and Inkermann, having had a narrow escape of being impaled on a Cossack lance in the last action; but was so imprudent as to "slang" Lord Raglan in his own tent on the conduct of the war. The Field-Marshal was not brilliant, and very likely, still, Prince's remarks were only too just. Still, Lord Raglan was an old Peninsular officer, brave as a lion, and very quick indeed to take offense. He ordered the Prince out of his tent, and threatened arrest. Further, he hinted to the authorities at home that the air of the Crimea appeared to disagree with his Royal Highness. The Duke of Cambridge had been disgraced to England in the spring of 1855.

Still, H.R.H. was very far from having forfeited prestige. Moreover, he was already (what he has continued ever since) extremely popular. His form is essentially manly, his language is robust, and there is nothing effeminate about him. When he sees a spade or a shovel, he is not slow to pick it up, nor does he mind his words, and he is not necessary, but expresses his views in good Anglo-Saxon. There are few more affable Princes—few more ready to give the countenance of their presence to charitable fetes, or even to fetes which are simply jovial. A Very Great Lady, indeed, was once heard to utter an exclamation which sounded like: "Common as these common things are, they are much more to the credit of 'those Cambridges' than that of the illustrious speaker."

However, the Duke continued in favour, because himself a Field-Marshal, head of the British Army, and so forth. I fancy he wears all the Queen's Orders, except the Thistle, which contains him have been intended for a delicate compeer. His salary, provision of income as an officer, "Commanding-in-chief" approximate to £4,000 a year. Then he has three or four colonies, which probably bring in as much again. He has also a respectable amount of patronage as a deputy for his title to a States for War does actually provide over his own domain. At certain ex-Premier felt a kind of despair as to the means of getting the army really and virtually under the control of Parliament. At last he hit on the expedient of putting the Command-in-Chief into commission. "The Duke was to be coaxed or worried out of his place, and his powers were to be delegated to a council of four or five Generals. The Council for the Minister, the Duke got wind of the scheme, and resolved to stick like a leech to his post. The Court warmly supporting him. The Duke, by the way, is a staunch Conservative, dining regularly with Lord Beaconsfield at the commencement of each session, and generally doing his best to prevent reform. When the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh went down to the House to vote in favour of marriage with a dowry, his sister, their cousin took the opportunity of voting against such unions.

The Duke has a good deal of fighting power in him. His worst fault, obstinacy, springs out of a healthy, vigorous temperament. In 1871, when he began to realize that our army was not all that it might be, Lord Beaconsfield came to the front, and declared that in the opinion of all men, the Duke of Cambridge was the right man in the right place. Sir Edward Ward, a distinguished officer with the military and amiable failing of looking rather too stiff in his stripes on a field-day, confessed that the Duke of Cambridge, however, is not unkindly a short temper.
